IPBS is an international interdisciplinary journal dedicated to the advancement of basic knowledge in the social and bio-behavioral sciences. IPBS covers such topics as cultural nature of human behavior and its evolutionary history, anthropology, ethology, communication processes between people, and within-- as well as between-- societies. A special focus will be given to integration of perspectives of the social and biological sciences through theoretical models of epigenesis. It contains articles pertaining to theoretical integration of ideas, epistemology of social and biological sciences, and original empirical research articles of generalized scientific value. History of the social sciences is covered by IPBS in cases relevant for further development of theoretical perspectives and empirical elaborations within the social and biological sciences. IPBS has the goal of integrating knowledge from different areas into a new synthesis of universal social science—overcoming the post-modernist fragmentation of ideas of recent decades.

Your manuscript will first be screened by me and one of my co-Editors for general fit into the journal. If we consider it fitting, it will be sent out to international review. If it is screened out on the basis of no fit, we may provide you with suggestions for other publication sources.

If your manuscript is screened in for full review, it will be sent to reviewers from an internationally representative pool. We expect the review to take 3 months. During our open review process, you can keep track of the status of your manuscript by accessing the following web site:
